"Authentic leaders establish trusting relationships with people throughout their organizations," writes Harvard Business School Professor Bill George, author of "Discover Your True North." His inspiring work on authentic leadership has a special resonance for CIOs who are struggling to close the IT/business gap while guiding the challenging transition to a digital enterprise. What will the IT organization look like in three years? With technology embedded everywhere, at the heart of every business process, should IT remain a separate group? What are the leadership hurdles in building these more trusted relationships? Our panel of LA-area CIOs will talk about their expanding partnerships with business leaders as they tackle these questions in this lively interactive discussion and workshop session on the future of IT.

The New Face of IT: Customer-Centric, Revenue-Generating, Business-Enabling

Tom Peck, CIO & SVP, Global IT, Travel & Procurement , AECOM

As IT expands beyond its traditional back-office operational role, CIOs in even the most conservative industries have a unique opportunity to use technology to drive business growth. At AECOM, a $20 billion global design, engineering and construction firm with 100,000 employees, CIO Tom Peck is in the midst of that convergence of back- and front-office IT. "This convergence puts a premium on CIOs and IT leaders to get beyond walls of the company," he says. "We need to differentiate our companies in the market. We need to sell and call on clients. It's a new skill and an opportunity that we all need to embrace." In this afternoon keynote, Tom will talk about his challenges and successes in transforming IT at AECOM into a business accelerator.

Planning for Security Breaches: What CIOs Need to Know Now

Matthew Karlyn, Partner, Technology Transactions & Outsourcing Practice, Foley & Lardner LLP

Security breaches happen to companies – every day, around the world. It is an unfortunate reality in today's data-driven economy. Because most companies will feel the impact of a security breach at some point in time, says tech attorney Matt Karlyn, it is critical that companies prepare in advance to minimize the impact to the assets, employees, and customers. “The entire C-suite and board is on the hot seat for security these days,” he says. As a result, “board members, CEOs, CFOs, and other senior executives are laser focused on understanding corporate information security. In this closing keynote, you’ll hear Matt’s expert legal analysis and practical advice on how to prepare the company for and protect the company from information security incidents.
