Big data is changing the way organisations and corporations are innovating. But finding the competitive value hidden in the big data you have gathered can be a challenge. So, how exactly is big data changing the way things are done? And what are the obstacles getting in the way of harnessing its power?

- Going from macro to micro to get useful information out of data
- Do people just get in the way of the data, or do people need to get in the way of the data?
- How good is the underlying data? And what about the metadata?
- Getting the right people to listen to what the data is - and isn't - saying
- Data protection: creating a single integrated global framework
- Grey clouds - the dirtiest thing on the internet?

'Building the Ship as She Sails' - Corporate Case Studies

Sean Carney, Chief Design Officer, Philips

Increasingly, instead of a 'build the product, then ship it' model, new technologies and the data they produce and harness are enabling business to 'build the ship as she sails.' Many new ventures, unencumbered by old ways of working, are already innovating in this way - but they still have their challenges. And what about the more established corporations, with more rigid organisational structures? How are both these types of company managing to rethink strategy and structure in a rapidly evolving landscape in order to realise the potential of big data and emerging technologies as significant drivers for growth?

3:10 pm - 4:00 pm

Closing Keynote - Re:designing the Future

Richard Seymour, Co-founder and Design Director, Seymourpowell
